Round Table

DRILL, BABY, DRILL- One Year Later

What Has Changed for Climate Research and Climate Policy?

One year after Trump's second inauguration, on January 20, we will meet to discuss the implications of his tenure for climate research and climate policy. Last year, we hosted an event exploring how his election and the expected political measures might affect these fields. Now, we would like to return to this topic with a new discussion. There will be short contributions by Sabine Fuss, Stephen Gardiner, Gottfried Kirchengast, Lukas Meyer and Darell Möllendorf. After the event, there will be a get-together with snacks, where we can continue to discuss the topic at hand. The following questions will be addressed:

- 1. Has the direction of research regarding climate change changed in the first year of Trump's presidency and, if so, how do you assess these changes?
- 2. Have the strategies of coping with climate change been adapted to the new political environment and, if so, how do you assess these adaptations?
- 3. Has the role academics working in the area of climate changed and should it change? Should they assume a more activist position?
