THE POSTWAR ANTISEMITE Culture and Complicity after the Holocaust

In his influential Réflexions sur la question juive (1946), Jean-Paul Sartre observed: “If the Jew did not exist, the anti-Semite would invent him.” He thereby articulated the figural Jew as the product of the antisemitic imagination in a formulation that actually ascribes a great deal of power to a figural Antisemite – an ‘outsider’ presumably separate from Sartre and his readers – who bears full responsibility for demonising Jews. This figure became an indispensable trope that formed the basis for the persistence of age-old prejudices against Jews after the Holocaust via coded and less explicit references.

This presentation examines the development and implications of the figural Antisemite using the example of film director Veit Harlan, who in 1948 was accused of helping the Nazis commit crimes against humanity by directing the successful Nazi propaganda film Jud Süß (1940). Although Harlan was acquitted in 1950, examination of witness testimony at the trials as well as events that occurred outside the courtroom in Hamburg reveal how efforts to distance Harlan from the label ‘Antisemite’ and the crimes of the Nazis actually contributed to the perpetuation of antisemitism in a new, postwar form.
