

Iris Eisenberger is a Professor of Public Law and European Economic Law at the University of Graz since March 2020. Her research focuses on public economic law, innovation and technological law and the protection of human rights. At the center of her research and teaching are theoretical, methodological and didactical questions. She has wide experience in running nationally and internationally funded research projects.

After obtaining her PhD in Law from the University of Graz, Austria, and a Master of Science in Political Theory from the London School of Economics and Political Science, UK, she received her Habilitation for Constitutional Law, Administrative Law and the related fields of European Union Law in 2014 for her book on "Innovation in the Law" from the University of Vienna. From January 2016 until February 2020, Iris Eisenberger was a Professor of Law and Head of the Institute of Law at the University of Natural Resources and Life Sciences, Vienna. She has work experience both in the Austrian and the European Parliament as well as in the Austrian Federal Chancellery's Department for Constitutional Law. Throughout her career, she has held visiting positions at numerous renowned universities including the European University Institute in Florence, the University of Freiburg, the Program on Science, Technology and Society at Harvard University, Mekelle University in Ethiopia, Macau University, the Jigme Singye Wangchuck School of Law in Bhutan and the Technical University of Munich.