Value Change and Gender Roles
in Central and Eastern European Countries after 1990 in the Context of Inglehart's Modernization Theory

Zum Vortrag

An intergenerational shift from more pro-family norms to individual-choice norms has been taking place since the 1980s. Modernization theory assumes that the perception of gender roles will change in the process of modernization. Conditions of economic and social security positively contributed to this shift especially in high-income countries. The contribution will focus on the modernization change on value structures in selected Central and Eastern European countries and compare them with Western European ones. First it points to whether the value shift in CEE countries is moving in the assumed direction and whether it is copying trends observed in Western European countries. After it will look at the gender roles and their developments in the light of Inglehart's modernization theory. Data collected within the cross-sectional European Values Study (EVS) will be used.
