CLOSING WORDS
We witnessed key transformations of citizenship in recent years. Processes of globalization and the increasing enmeshment of citizenship in processes of governance suggest that mobility, not belonging, is the key element in today’s world, rendering citizenship increasingly meaningless as primary marker of identification.

Yet, at the same time, citizenship is still the predominant institution that reflects global inequality and in which discourses on otherness unfold. The ‘right’ citizenship still largely defines personal opportunities under a domestic and global perspective, and states increasingly raise the symbolic value of citizenship.

With this conference, we hope to illuminate, elucidate, and review this juxtaposition and tension inherent in the concept of citizenship today in an effort to understand the processes responsible for the changes. We thank you all for attending and look forward to exciting presentations and discussions.
